Excerpt: . the air was filled with the not disagreeable odor of burning stalks. From across the fields the farmer s merry whistle, mingling with the voices of meadow llarks, reached our ears. Everything was suggestive of new life, these busy and happy hours of spring. Crossing at hrier field, which proved unprofitable collecting ground, we entered a net wood, a favorite nesting place of the cardinals. Aweek previous several nests had been located. To our surprise out of seven nests examined-four were found to be deserted. We were not long remaining in ignorance of the cause, and at one nest discovered the rascally blue jays at work. They were quite noisy and as they made no move to leave the vicinity, we hustled them off with clubs, and they disappeared in the forest uttering loud cries. In one nest an empty shell had been...
