In this case the circle is used, and the vowel-sign is placed to the other consonant-sign, just as it would be if that sign stood without the circle. The circle is then read first, though it seems to come after the vowel-sign; thus, is read eat, but if the circle is placed at the head of the long consonant, thus, f the circle reads first, and the word becomes seat. The attention of the student is specially directed to this case. IV. The fourth case is, when a vowel comes between two consonants, as in the preceding case, the last of the two consonants being s or z; thus, j pass; p boast; a moose; / roast; face. Here the circle is used, and the vowel-sign is placed after the consonant-sign; the circle then seems to come before it, but must be read last. In...
