D. 1875 No subject of contemplation possesses more of thrilling interest than the future of a human life. Though veiled in that darkness which covers all the future, its vast possibilities, its certainties and uncertainties sometimes rise before the imagination in pictures vivid and impressive. There are, with all of us, certain periods in life peculiarly calculated to awaken in the mind anxious inquiry respecting the future. To such a period have you arrived, my young friends, and God only knows how many anxious inquiries respecting your future lives even now are taxing the mind and heart of those you love. Into that dark future, which our knowledge can not enter, the imagination peers with wistful eye, and with fond affection traces for you the paths which buoyant hope suggests. As experience casts its light upon the picture thus drawn in fancy, many of its most attractive features are darkened by doubt, and vague...
