XIV The speech at Wingate--Address to the cadets of the Naval Academy -- A second offer from the sultan declined -- Offer of mission to Brazil declined--Life of Harrison--Dramatization of Ben-Hur--Conclusion. In the presidential campaign of 1888, General Wallace was asked by the national Republican committee to deliver speeches at Chickering Hall, in New York, and at the Auditorium, in Chicago. Both invitations were declined, but he did consent to speak for the farmers in his own county, many of them old friends and neighbors. They fully appreciated the discrimination made in their favor. The meeting was held near the village of Wingate, and in spite of bad weather a large audience was present. General Wallace chose as his subject his reasons for deserting the Democratic party. It proved to be one of the most effective addresses made that year. A full report...
