Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: .about the question of design--especially as concerns the reinforcement. Practically all cracking of parts of concrete structures both at an early date and subsequently under heavy usage fall under this head. Early designers, failing to recognize the monolithic nature of the material, and thinking of it in terms of wood, brick, and steel rather than in terms of itself, neglected to provide for many stresses with steel reinforcement. Some of these stresses--peculiar to the material--were fundamental and some unimportant. The fundamental ones were those existing over and approaching the supports, induced by the monolithic nature of the material. It was not sufficiently realized that with concrete there is no longer simple, isolated, disjointed action from support to support--as with timber and steel--but that action is continuous throughout the structure, and that if the design were not adapted to this continuity--of action, tensile stresses were going to...
