Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Evenings With Great Authors, Vol. 1: How and What to Read; Shakespeare; Lincoln When I first saw Charles Dudley Warner s monumental library of literature I felt that few people would really read those large volumes, in which each author was represented by examples or specimens of his work. Young people, especially, do not care for specimens, but want interesting human material that is alive today. Each author, it seemed to me, should be represented with that which would make the most interesting evening s reading from his works, something with the element of completeness, in which the human interest dominated over the literary. After all, it is human interest that holds us all. The present series has therefore been prepared with a view to introducing the reader to a number of our greatest authors as personal and helpful friends. I have known these authors, and they have meant a great deal in my life. I have myself enjoyed reading the stories and poems here presented, and I have separated that which I enjoyed most from some things I enjoyed less; and I now offer this series of studies as presenting what I consider the most stimulating reading from these great authors.
